In the tapestry of life, our mothers hold a special place. They are the ones who nurture us, guide us, and shape who we become. But what if the woman you thought you knew your entire life turns out to be a stranger? What if the secrets she kept hidden from you are finally revealed?

That's the journey that author Sarah Smith embarked on when she began to question the truth of her mother's past. In her memoir, Mom, How Do You?, Smith shares her personal and moving account of uncovering the hidden truths about her mother's life.

Smith's mother, Helen, was a complex and enigmatic woman. She was a loving and supportive mother, but she also had a dark side that she kept hidden from her family. As Smith grew older, she began to notice inconsistencies in the stories her mother told about her past. It was as if there were pieces of a puzzle missing, and Smith was determined to find the missing pieces.

Smith's journey takes her across the country and back in time. She interviews family members, friends, and even strangers who knew her mother. Slowly but surely, she begins to piece together the truth about Helen's life. She learns about her mother's childhood, her first marriage, and the secrets that she kept from everyone.

As Smith uncovers the truth about her mother's past, she also learns more about herself. She realizes that she is not the only one who has been affected by her mother's secrets. Her siblings, her father, and even her own children have all been shaped by the choices that Helen made.

Mom, How Do You? is a powerful and moving memoir about the complex and enduring bond between mothers and daughters. It is a story about secrets, lies, and the power of forgiveness. It is a story that will resonate with anyone who has ever wondered about the unspoken truths in their own family's history.
